STRIKE QUESTIONS.

Wharfmen Again Meet

1.

As the war dragged on there were fewer able-bodied men at home and the death toll overseas was mounting. The streets were full of women wearing black mourning clothes.

Thousands of families were enduring the long wait for news of their relatives' fates on the battlefields of Europe.

Shortages at home of items such as sugar and paper were also being felt.

Soldiers often returned from the war with terrible injuries, diseases, or 'shell-shock' (a form of Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder). Many of these men were cared for at the Caulfield Military Hospital. An infectious diseases hospital for soldiers still in training also operated from the Wiseman family mansions, Ashleigh and Sawbridgeworth, in Glenroy from 1915 to 1917.

People started to despair that the War would never end.

Brunswick resident Maude O'Loughlin's three sons went to war and two were killed in action. She lost her husband shortly after in an accident.
